You can also alter images by changing the size and transparency of the pixels. You'll use layers to create all of these changes. Layers allow you to assemble images into a layered image. You can apply color and other effects to the images on the layers. You can also add effects to individual pixels on the layers. You can create and edit images in Photoshop using any of the tools that you use every day: a brush, pen, eraser, or even a key. You can also work on the original pixels by using the tools like Select and Mask. Photoshop and Photoshop Elements share almost all the same tools and features, but with some key differences. For example, Photoshop can lock the size and shape of each pixel layer, while Elements doesn't. Elements allows you to crop and resize images, but does not allow you to lock layers in the same manner. Photoshop has more features than Elements and, at its core, is a more powerful program. Q: Why my Spring `HttpReponse.ok(...)` return `HttpStatus.OK.INTERNAL_ERROR` I have a Spring MVC application that return a `JsonObject` in response to a `HTTP GET`. It return all right. However, if I change the content-type of the response to `application/octet-stream` and I send some data as a body, it returns `HttpStatus.OK.INTERNAL_ERROR` What happens exactly when Spring treat `HttpStatus.OK.INTERNAL_ERROR`? A: I don't know what you consider "catch all" but the catch all is to consider as an error all of status code below 400, as by definition of HTTP status codes all response codes with status code not in range 1..400 are considered an error. In most error states those, e.g. 4xx, refer to errors in request - client or server, while in the following codes you might have a different situation. So 400 is reserved for errors of level 2 - the server is unable to process the request and usually even when sending an HTML page that might be considered a general problem. See also this response that says that 400 is reserved for errors: `HTTP Status Code 400 – Bad Request` The 400 (Bad Request) status code indicates that the server cannot or will not process the request due to something that is perceived to be a client error (e.g., malformed request syntax, invalid request message framing, or deceptive request message routing). 500 is reserved for errors of level 5 - server not able to process the request due to something specific to its configuration. And for example for `WebSocket` failures it is not so much a server error but rather a network condition that caused the error. 200..299 for client and 300..399 for server side errors are maybe more widely known. Also if you get a 400 in the catch-all case, it usually means that you sent a request that is syntactically invalid - you can also get a 400 for e.g. for you request when you have two dots in the method declaration instead of one - for example a `POST` and you use a header attribute that is not valid for that type of request. See also 5.1.1 of the `HTTP/1.1` specification on that point. It is actually 4xx because `HttpStatus.OK.INTERNAL_ERROR` has no
